KGMB-9, as well as PBS-Hawai'i-11, are considering the August airing. The PBS station also has committed to host a half-hour "town hall" discussion after the screening. Other stations may pick up that feed or present their own discussions afterward, Lee said.

"The cooperation exhibited by Hawai'i's major network affiliates agreeing to a prime-time simulcast makes us proud to be part of this industry," said Lee, who is known for her reflective films on paniolo, Papakölea and Waikiki.

She said the worsening ice crisis in Hawai'i was a challenge she had to acknowledge and investigate.

"The purpose of the film is to show how arts and entertainment can be used as an educational tool, too, for the entire public. If we can call attention - and TV is the best medium - to provide valuable information to help enforcement, and show how the private sector can get involved, we'll have succeeded," she said.
